

HAPPENINGS IN UTAH TOWNS

Ogden News

Office—336 Twenty-fifth street.
Circulation Department 336 twenty-fifth street.

APPOINTMENTS MADE IN FORESTRY SERVICE

Numerous Changes in Personnel of Force in Charge of District
Four.

(Special to The Herald-Republican.)
Ogden, Nov. 14.—The forestry service has just announced the following appointments and changes on national forests in District 4:

James H. Baldwin was appointed assistant forest ranger on the Fillmore national forest; Orin H. Griffin, on the Powell, and William H. Horton on the Sawtooth.

The forest guards appointed were: Roy P. Ellis, on the Challis; Thomas J. Carey, on the Idaho, and G. S. Matthews, on the Muskogee.

Joseph S. Moffatt, jr., was appointed forest guard (hunter) on the Cache, and Albert W. Horton, jr., on the Sevier.

Mrs. Emma Stauffer was appointed clerk (stenographer and typewriter), and Miss Eleanor Hall, temporary clerk (stenographer and typewriter), in the district headquarters at Ogden, Utah.

Miss Katherine Stealy was appointed forest clerk (temporary) on the Carlton.

The title of James E. Jewell, on the Dixie national forest, was changed from deputy forest supervisor to forest supervisor, and that of Robert V. Reynolds, on the Wasatch, from forest assistant to forest supervisor.

Edward W. Headstein, forest guard on the Maun, was transferred to the Colville forest, in the state of Washington.

C. E. Dunston has been temporarily assigned to an investigation of forest conditions in the state of Mississippi in co-operation with the state.

NEW POSTOFFICE OPEN

Federal Employees Spend All Sunday
Moving Into the Beautiful Building.

(Special to The Herald-Republican.)
Ogden, Nov. 14.—The old postoffice building was vacated today and the entire force moved into the new federal building on the corner of Grant avenue and Twenty-fourth street. This beautiful building, built at a cost of $200,000, has cost the government $20,000. The first appropriation was $20,000, and when it was decided to enlarge the original plans $20,000 more was appropriated.

The principal part of the structure is of gray sandstone and is furnished with massive doors and windows. The entrance to the building is on Twenty-fourth street and is brilliantly lighted by six large arc lights. The main corridor is finished with walls of highly polished Vermont marble, the ceiling is of white iron.

Nervous Headache

"I know from experience that Dr. Miles' Anti-Pain Pills will relieve severe cases of headache quickly." MRS. GEO. S. HENRY, Sullivan, Wash.

In many persons the least excitement, exertion or irritation causes headache. They cannot attend church, theatre, places of amusement, travel, or mingle in a crowd without suffering an attack of headache. The nerves of the brain are easily excited, and this irritable condition causes pain. Such persons should take

Dr. Miles' Anti-Pain Pills before starting out, or on the first indication of an attack. They invariably relieve all such misery. The first package will benefit; if not, your druggist will return your money.

This week only

My great suit offer—Select your woollens from my stock—I'll make up any suit you want at only—

$25

Give a handsome fancy vest free to boot.

DANIELS THE TAILOR

57 West Second South.

BOOTH'S GUARANTEED OYSTERS

(Full Measure—Solid Means)
Always in new cans—from the shell to your table, Booth's Guaranteed Oysters carry the tempting aroma of the sea, the flavor of "newly-caught," the purity of deep waters. They are a delicate treat for lovers of good things to eat.

At all first-class dealers, or

BOOTH FISHERIES CO.

30 West 1st South.

At all first-class dealers, or

BOOTH FISHERIES CO.

30 West 1st South.

At all first-class dealers, or

BOOTH FISHERIES CO.

30 West 1st South.

At all first-class dealers, or

BOOTH FISHERIES CO.

30 West 1st South.

At all first-class dealers, or

BOOTH FISHERIES CO.

30 West 1st South.

At all first-class dealers, or

BOOTH FISHERIES CO.

30 West 1st South.

At all first-class dealers, or

BOOTH FISHERIES CO.

30 West 1st South.

At all first-class dealers, or

BOOTH FISHERIES CO.

30 West 1st South.

AMUSEMENTS

AMUSEMENTS TODAY.

Orpheum Theatre—Vaudeville, 2:15 p. m. and 8:15 p. m.
Bath Theatre—"The Spotters," 8:15 p. m.
Bungalow Theatre—Pantagruel, 8:15 p. m.
Grand Theatre—"The Great Divide," 8:15 p. m.

ORPHEUM THEATRE.

The best that can be said of the bill at the Orpheum this week is that it is a bill of the highest quality. It may be said that the Orpheum goes to the limit by extra fine performances in the past, which would account for the fact that they are in the city, except with the Big City Quartette, which made an instantaneous and unqualified hit. As usual on Sunday nights, the house was packed, every seat being sold and the "S. R. O." sign out.

With voices that blended into one harmonious unit of sound, the Big City Quartette sang its way into the hearts of the audience. The quartette, composed of James Emerson, baritone; Charles Bates, second tenor, and Gus Reed, bass, composed the quartette. All the songs rendered were of the popular variety, some being of the semi-comic kind. After the quartette, the Orpheum presented a new act, the "S. R. O." quartette, which made an instantaneous and unqualified hit. As usual on Sunday nights, the house was packed, every seat being sold and the "S. R. O." sign out.

The Carmen troupe, made up of two women, two men and a boy, presented an original tight and slack wire performance. The troupe, known as the "S. R. O." quartette, made an instantaneous and unqualified hit. As usual on Sunday nights, the house was packed, every seat being sold and the "S. R. O." sign out.

Perrell Brothers, billed as the smartest of comedy cyclists, gave an exhibition of clever riding. Several tricks, new to Orpheum goers, were introduced. The initial appearance in Salt Lake of Les Myosotis, said to be late premiere dancers of the Royal Opera, was a great treat with the favor that might be expected. That their dancing was good there is no doubt; but, notwithstanding this, the act is one that does not seem to satisfy the public taste.

In a burlesque on legitimate legdramas Henry Clive succeeded in getting a few laughs by his droll witticisms. The act was fair.

A "Baby Grand" was the title of a little playlet presented by Walter Lewis and company. The secret marriage of a doctor and a woman, a former friend of his enemy and the homecoming of the young married couple furnish material for several amusing scenes.

Miss Edna Aug gave fair characterization of the chorus girl, German servant girl and the amateur opera singer. During the course of her performance, the girl monologue several original and decidedly humorous jokes were given.

COLONIAL THEATRE.

"The Spotters," a play that has been a great success throughout the north-west, opened at the Colonial theatre last night to a capacity house. It is a dramatization of Rex Beach's novel, which owes its popularity to the true picture it presents of life in the Alaska mining camps.

In 1900, Beach was in Nome at the time of the great conspiracy against the miners, and his novel is founded on fact. The play is a stirring melodrama that is of vivid interest, particularly to westerners, who are more or less familiar with the scenes recorded in the book. Life in the north, away from civilization, takes on a more or less familiar, and a mental in human nature is the ruling trait. Before the coming of the law, the men know no other force than might, and a spirit of fair play. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

The play is in five acts. For three acts it is thrilling. The last two acts are given over to a dramatic treatment of the law and the audience with wrong impressions. Where the book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

BATH CABINETS

AMUSEMENTS TODAY.

Orpheum Theatre—Vaudeville, 2:15 p. m. and 8:15 p. m.
Bath Theatre—"The Spotters," 8:15 p. m.
Bungalow Theatre—Pantagruel, 8:15 p. m.
Grand Theatre—"The Great Divide," 8:15 p. m.

ORPHEUM THEATRE.

The best that can be said of the bill at the Orpheum this week is that it is a bill of the highest quality. It may be said that the Orpheum goes to the limit by extra fine performances in the past, which would account for the fact that they are in the city, except with the Big City Quartette, which made an instantaneous and unqualified hit. As usual on Sunday nights, the house was packed, every seat being sold and the "S. R. O." sign out.

With voices that blended into one harmonious unit of sound, the Big City Quartette sang its way into the hearts of the audience. The quartette, composed of James Emerson, baritone; Charles Bates, second tenor, and Gus Reed, bass, composed the quartette. All the songs rendered were of the popular variety, some being of the semi-comic kind. After the quartette, the Orpheum presented a new act, the "S. R. O." quartette, which made an instantaneous and unqualified hit. As usual on Sunday nights, the house was packed, every seat being sold and the "S. R. O." sign out.

The Carmen troupe, made up of two women, two men and a boy, presented an original tight and slack wire performance. The troupe, known as the "S. R. O." quartette, made an instantaneous and unqualified hit. As usual on Sunday nights, the house was packed, every seat being sold and the "S. R. O." sign out.

Perrell Brothers, billed as the smartest of comedy cyclists, gave an exhibition of clever riding. Several tricks, new to Orpheum goers, were introduced. The initial appearance in Salt Lake of Les Myosotis, said to be late premiere dancers of the Royal Opera, was a great treat with the favor that might be expected. That their dancing was good there is no doubt; but, notwithstanding this, the act is one that does not seem to satisfy the public taste.

In a burlesque on legitimate legdramas Henry Clive succeeded in getting a few laughs by his droll witticisms. The act was fair.

A "Baby Grand" was the title of a little playlet presented by Walter Lewis and company. The secret marriage of a doctor and a woman, a former friend of his enemy and the homecoming of the young married couple furnish material for several amusing scenes.

Miss Edna Aug gave fair characterization of the chorus girl, German servant girl and the amateur opera singer. During the course of her performance, the girl monologue several original and decidedly humorous jokes were given.

COLONIAL THEATRE.

"The Spotters," a play that has been a great success throughout the north-west, opened at the Colonial theatre last night to a capacity house. It is a dramatization of Rex Beach's novel, which owes its popularity to the true picture it presents of life in the Alaska mining camps.

In 1900, Beach was in Nome at the time of the great conspiracy against the miners, and his novel is founded on fact. The play is a stirring melodrama that is of vivid interest, particularly to westerners, who are more or less familiar with the scenes recorded in the book. Life in the north, away from civilization, takes on a more or less familiar, and a mental in human nature is the ruling trait. Before the coming of the law, the men know no other force than might, and a spirit of fair play. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

The play is in five acts. For three acts it is thrilling. The last two acts are given over to a dramatic treatment of the law and the audience with wrong impressions. Where the book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.

There are many stirring and realistic features in the play, but the acting is poor. The book gives opportunity for strong dramatic action, the play is almost a farce. It is impossible to present the intense scene between Helen Chester and Struve adequately. It would be better to leave out, particularly as it is not necessary to the development of the story. It does, however, give opportunity for the better acting of the present company. The unpleasant character of Wilton Struve, the lawyer, as played by Frank Whiting, is given in a well done. He is a dissolute, drunken loafer, the tool of Macnamara, just enough to keep out of the way of the law himself while ruining the conspirators. Mr. McQuarrie's interpretation of the role of Macnamara is a masterpiece. The book and the play are in contrast to the other less well presented characters.

The company playing "The Spotters" is only fair. It does not meet the requirements of the really stirring melodrama, and many opportunities for clever work are not taken advantage of. One scene, the fight at the end of the third act, is given in a very poor manner. The book and the play show conditions as they actually existed, and have caught the spirit of the time and place.